Long before the recent revival of beadwork, Lillie had already employed her technique to further develop and refine forms of jewellery art through the use of countless natural, glass, or metal beads... The production of a piece of jewellery takes several hundred hours.' Robert K. Liu in: Jacqueline I. Lillie Works, Arbeiten, Oeuvres 1990-97, p. 3f "It is the extraordinary intricacy of the work that highlights the distinctive character of her practice, while at the same time suggesting the countless hours of labour it entails. Each bead is threaded by hand onto a silk strand and individually knotted, thereby ensuring the suppleness and flexibility required for the final execution." Dr. Elisabeth Schmuttermeier, Curator of the Metal Department and the Wiener Werkstätte Archive, Austrian Museum of Applied Arts (MAK), Vienna in Jacqueline I. Lillie Works, Arbeiten, Oeuvres 1990-97, p. 7. Jacqueline I. ## A rare high-back chair and two armchairs from the fg 2001 series, after a design by Dieter Rams

Dieter Rams and Wolfgang Feierbach were originally business partners. The model series designed by Dieter Rams in 1962 was only manufactured until 1965 by Wolfgang Feierbach – a pioneer in fibreglass production – on behalf of Vitsoe. Ultimately, Vitsoe discontinued the collaboration due to economic constraints. After Wolfgang Feierbach took over the entire production of the furniture himself, a legal dispute arose between Dieter Rams and Wolfgang Feierbach. Unlike Vitsoe, Feierbach moulded the shell from a single piece, as the individual parts tended to warp. Vitsoe also filed a lawsuit, and Wolfgang Feierbach ceased production in the early 1970s.
